POETRY.

THE PRIMA DONNA.

With painted cheeks, and witching smiles, And fingers closed in golden rings; Squallanti every heart beguiles, And crowds attracts whene'er she sings.

Ah, fair Italian! maid divine! Of youthful hearts the proud enslaver; Who makest amorous swains to pine, And woundest mortals with a quaver;

May no rude shakes thy rest disturb, Though grief thou'st caused to many a ninny ? And well we know thy notes superb Are always sure to fetch a guinea.

In quod confined, don't care a pin,
Of speedy exit never doubt;
Though scores have helped to put thee in,
Thy bars will surely get thee out.

Whene'er thou visitest our shores, In crowds arrive th' admiring throngs; Th' o'erflowing house its myriads pours, And hails thee as the Queen of Songs.

With open mouth, and foreign air,
With eyes upturned and graceful nods;
No mortal can with thee compare,
Thou hast the favour of the gods,

Announced in opera to appear,
Full houses greet these squalling wenches;
While Hamlet, Richard, Cato, Lear,
Are all performed to empty benches.

What novel crotchet in their brains Have Englishmen thus idly taken; Donnas to heap with ill-got gains, While British talent is forsaken?

Poetry among the Jews.—Ages before that marvellous instrument of music, the Greek language, was ready for the touch of a Sappho or a Pindar, the venerable Hebrew of the Patriarchs had been wrought up to the very highest pitch of human sublimity, in the triumphant songs of Moses and Deborah. In these, the total being, the very soul and body as it were, of the peot—became vocal; and images of national delivery of as it were, of the peot—became vocal; and images of national delivery, of conquest, and revenge, are glanced forth like sparks of fire, from the solemn, because intense, enthusiasm of the leader out of Egypt, and the victorious mother in Israel. Although every thought, of the leader out of Egypt, and the victorious mother in Israel. Although every thought, every word, in these effusions, be very Hebrew of the Hebrews, how easy to distinguish the diverse operation of personal feeling in the more disnifuting and depend a specific paid in the control of the second stablished. But, admirable as these poems are, under all the disadvantages of translation—if indeed they do suffer much disadvantage in the nervous diction fine rhymes of our English Biblethey do by no means present the only models of lytic expression even amongst the people of Israel. Besides the second song of Moses his departing hymn-we need not point out the many noble and affecting, but less impetuous, effusions of praise and thanksgiving, with which we are all so familiar in the book of Psalms, in the authorised translation of which, strange to say, there is, if not less genius, certainly less accuracy, than in any other part of our version. The force and the colouring, indeed may vary, according to the age, and circumstances, and temper of a Moses, a Deborah, and a David; but, in every age, and under all circumstances-so long as Israel was truly Israel-the Hebrew muse was uniformly simple and sublime-in her birth from the altar of the Lord !- Quarterly Review. Death .- Whatever be the causes of dissolution, whether sudden violence or lingering malady, the immediate modes by which death is brought about, appear to be but two. In one, the nervous system is primarily attacked, and there is a sinking, sometimes an instantaneous extinction of life, in the course of the other, dissolution is effected by the circulation of black venous blood in the arteries of the body, instead of the red arterial blood. The former is termed death by syncope or fainting, the latter, death by asphyxia. In the last mentioned manner of death, which is the result of disease, the struggle is long protracted, and accompanied by all the visible marks of agony, which the imagination associates with the closing scene of life. Death does not strike all the organs of the body at the same time; some may be said to survive others; and the lungs are among the last to give up their functions and die. As death approaches, they become more and more oppressed, the air cells are loaded with an increased quantity of the fluid, which naturally lubricates the surface; the atmosphere can now no longer come in contact with the air-cells, without first mermeating this viscid fluidhence the rattle. Nor is the contact sufficiently perfect to change the venous into arterial blood; an unprepared fluid consequently issues from the lungs into the heart, and is thence transmitted to every organ of generally tranquil sleep, filled with dreams, which impel the drying lip to murmur out the names of friends, and the occupations and

STENOGRAPHIC GLIMPSES OF CONGRESS. No. LXII.

Washington, Feb. 11, 1834 .- It was my unhappy fortune to be a sad spectator to-day, o. the most melancholy and appalling event that has ever taken place in Congress; one, without a parallel, except the death of Chathamand surpassing even that in the suddenness of its shock, and the absence of all warning.

JUDGE BOULDIN of Virginia, the successor of the unrivalled Randolph, is no He rose in the House this morning at twenty minutes to two, in the full vigor of mind and body, to commence a speech on the subject of the Deposites; and began by prefacing it with some reasons why he had not announced in his place the death of Mr Randolph, a member elect of that body. He had not spoken five minutes, before he sunk, with an unfinished sentence upon his tongue, into the arms of a member. He was immediately borne from the area to the centre south window in the rear, and, being laid upon the carpet, was instantly bled by Dr Southerland, on the temple and arm; the blood flowed a moment, but the vital current ebbed back to the heart. The glazed eye—the fallen countenance—the stiffened limbs—the throbless pulse-and breathless lips-afl told his agonized friends, and distracted wife, bending over the shuddering scene, that the hand of death had affixed his seal upon him for-

Mrs Bouldin was borne away by main force, in convulsions, uttering the most heartpiercing lamentations. I never witnessed a scene of so much consternation, and such indescribable agony. All took place in less than ten minutes from the moment the deceased rose in his place. His wife was in the gallery, and saw him fall. There were fortunately but few ladies here to witness the distressing scene, most of them being in the Senate, to hear Mr Bibb.

The melancholy event was immediately an-nounced in the Senate by Mr Preston; and that body adjourned, pouring in torrents to the House to witness the sad spectacle. The body was borne to the Speaker's apartment, and laid out. No adjournment of the House took place, such was the confusion, till some time after the event happened. The Speaker remained in his chair about three minutes after the deceased fell, and till most of the members had left, or were leaving their seats, and then quit it hastily, and rushed with consternation in his countenance, to the chilling death-court of his friend.

I had been in the Senate a few minutes before, but, finding it uncomfortable from the heat and crowd, passed to the house and took a seat in the ladies' gallery, immediately in the rear of the deceased. I had scarcely got seated before the Speaker announced, "the gentleman from Virginia has the floor." He rose slowly and deliberately, and commenced, in a loud and distinct voice, by alluding to the remarks, made a few days since, by his colleague, (Mr Wise) on the death of Mr Ran-He said his colleague had remarked that the death of this gentleman, though a member elect of this body, had not been announced, and, implying that he had considered it his own duty to do it, he was proceeding to give the reasons why he had omitted it. He did not speak in a tone indicative of grief, or feeling, or any strong emotion. As the subject was interesting to me, from my admiration of Mr Randolph's splendid talents, I fixed my attention very closely upon the speaker; and was surprised to see him pause twice and incline his head, as I thought, towards a member, as if to take some hint from him, though I could hear no remark made; the second time he made a pause and inclination, I saw the member shrink back as I thought, which led me to the conclusion that something was wrong; and when the speaker recovered his position again, he repeated the beginning of the sentence he had begun, and, making a momentary pause, sided a little the right, dropped his head and sunk into the arms of a member. It was half a minute seemingly, before any one moved-they all seemed paralyzed with consternation. A gentleman soon however took a tumbler of water. sitting at hand, and put it to the lips of the deceased; but he had thrown his head back, and nothing could be administered : instantly half a dozen members nearest by came up, and one with main strength bent his head forward, took off his neck-cloth, and dashed the water over his head and neck, and another gentleman with Herculean strength bore him to the window. I perceived at once it was not a fainting fit; the countenance did not change from its natural pale cast, till the deceased dropped his head; and then I saw it instantly flushed. I supposed first, it was an epileptic fit; but it was a paralysis of the heart,—the countenance soon growing pale again in death.

REIS EFFENDI.

No business of any moment was transacted in either House of Congress on Wednesday, except the passage of Resolutions to attend the funeral of Mr Bouldin.

Thursday was occupied by the funeral ceremonies of Mr Bouldin.

The U. States Bank curtailed in its discounts in the month of January alone, in this city, upwards of SEVEN HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS! In Philadelphia, with twice the population, FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND. Yet the Boston merchants submit to this gross partiality, and continue to advocate the Bank !

A Side-winder .- After the kind interference of Mr Clay to settle the unpleasant controversy which arose between Judge Wilkins and Mr Webster in the Senate of the U. States, relative to an expression made by the latter gentleman, and quoted by the former-according to the Portland Courier, Mr Clay went round behind Judge Wilkins, and said Senate for hard words, he might draw upon developed in language spirited, powerful, and him, and he would honor his draft.

John W. Brashear, whose case was noticed in Saturday's Post, was arraigned for further examination, and pleaded guilty, to the complaint charging him with stealing, on Tuesday night, a lot of combs, valued at $80, the property of Messrs Edward and John Fiske known .- Mer. Jour. Allen, from the brig Virginia, at Salem. He was second mate of the brig, and had charge of her at the time; and being in very embarrassed circumstances, and tempted by the opportunity, was betrayed into the theft. Had he told the real truth, when first arrested by Mr Constable Pierce, it is possible that he might have avoided a criminal prosecution, as hot houses .- N. Y. "Konrad of Rheinfeldt, or the Widowed Bride," by Mr F. S. HILL, is altogether different in character from his former popular production, the "Six Degrees of Crime." It is, however, a well-written play, with an excellent and deeply interesting plot, founded upon an historical event of ruthless violence and treason, in the middle ages, which has never before been represented on the stage. The presence of mind and heroic courage of Anna | no attention was paid to what he said. when first assailed by Konrad, and the opportune interference of the disguised Duke-her subsequeut seizure by Konrad's orders, and her leaping from the battlement, apparently at the risk of inevitable death, to escape his violence-her horror at the idea of being wedded to him, though it would restore her with unsullied honor to rank and wealth-her final surprise at finding herself an unexpected, but to him, if he wished to draw upon any of the happy widow, are all happily conceived, and elegant. The error, respecting the Duke's death, in which Konrad is confirmed by seeing the eygnet ring, and the violence towards the heroine, in which he persists in consequence of it, is extremely natural, and also important in its consequences. The underplot-a necessary excrescence in the prevailing dramatic taste-is full of humor and laughable points, which tell with great effect, in the representation. The little "spat" between Ulric and Anna on the wedding day, and the Garland Anna on the wedding day, and the Garland Dance, are very amusing and agreeable inci- character of Macbeth, at the Vittoria theatre, dents, which we would not exchange for the best of Baron Brombrowski's adventures.
